LET'S TALK

role in the change, but added that none of them would have been enough to put a stop to communism if it were not for Gorbachev and the new way of thinking in the Russian government.

Vlad Muresan approached the topic philosophically. He called communism a "transcendental crime," because it was the principle of millions of individual crimes. One of Muresan's main arguments was that since communism meant materialism, it had to die. "Materialism cannot provide any foundation to humanism," he explained, adding that any doctrine without morality was doomed. Muresan also talked about the dangers of "creative destruction" that took place during communism—when you destroy the past and create everything anew, your structure will inevitably fall apart.

Unlike Muresan, Michnik spoke in his native language, and thus, through a translator, who, it must be mentioned, did not always translate Michnik's words to his advantage (accurately). In fact, whispers of annoyed Poles in the audience flew around like bullets. Michnik, the leading organizer of the democratic opposition in Poland in 1989, and currently editor-in-chief of Gazeta Wyborcza, began with a joke: a Polish schoolgirl comes home with an assignment—she has to write why she loves the Soviet Union. She asks her father, mother and grandmother for help, but they all tell her that the Soviet Union is an awful place responsible for innumerable deaths of innocent people. So the girl completes her homework by saying that she loves the Soviet Union because no one else does. After laughter from the audience, Michnik said that he will speak of communism "with love." And so he did. Communism, according to him, was a promise of dignity, of a utopian society, of a world without money where anyone, even a cook, could be in power. "It was a perfect project but it had one problem—the people were in its way." Michnik added that communism destroyed thinking men. He explained that once people became the property of the state, any talk of a utopian society had to be a joke. He concluded by saying that "communism fell because it was a lie."

After the three panelists presented their respective theories on the end of communism, a few minutes were left for questions from the audience. An American man contradicted professor Brown's argument about Gorbachev's pivotal role in the process, stating instead that it was the Pope and a sense of nationalism in Poland in particular, as well as the support of Reagan, that ultimately caused the fall of communism. Brown fought back, dry in style but rich in context, and kept to his argument. But the last words belonged to the star of the panel, Adam Michnik. "If you ask an American who is responsible for the end of communism, they'll say it's Reagan," he started. "If you ask a German, they'll say it's Kohl. If you ask a Pole, everyone in Poland knows that we ended communism." Michnik smiled, and once again made the audience laugh. Then his face turned serious, and he explained that the scope of communism is so big that there is no one element that could have possibly ended it. "So the discussion about who or what caused the fall of communism is mostly a discussion about who is more beautiful," he finished, thus letting us know that his co-panelists' theories, as well as his own, are nothing more than theories, while the reality behind the fall of communism is, in fact, much more complex.
